The present invention relates generally to the apparatus, and more particularly to the design and construction of such apparatus. Such apparatus have been known previously. Examples of such apparatus can be found in U.S. Pat. No. 5,010,940 (Young) and U.S. Pat. No. 4,733,612 (Young), the entire disclosures of which are incorporated herein by reference. In such apparatus, an array of body support members have interposed therebetween through which an axial flow of circulating fluid is provided. In order to contain fluid and prevent fluid from passing through a space between adjacent support members, a plurality of seals have been utilized. The seals in such apparatus have been of a generally flat configuration and have been of a variety of types, including, for example, packing, rolling and ribbon seals. In such cases, the seals have been disposed between adjacent support members in such manner that, due to the flow of the circulating fluid, a force is created to urge the seals against the support members. It has been found desirable to maintain a specific level of force between the seals and the support members in order to achieve a sealing effect. A particularly useful configuration for an apparatus of the type noted above is described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,010,940 (Young). In the Young patent, a frame structure is described wherein an array of body support members are disposed between a pair of side frames. A series of seals are positioned in an alternate array between adjacent support members. A pair of end plates having a central air passageway through their axial center line are positioned to overlie adjacent end support members. Thus, a fluid flow path is provided around the periphery of each support member. In Young, it has been desired to utilize a pair of end plates each having an internal and external diameter which provide a desirable flow area for the circulating fluid. To this end, an elongate cylindrical casing is utilized in which there is disposed in at least one end plate an annular air passageway through which the circulating fluid flows.
