This app continues to be the industry standard for photo editing. It could have been further along in the technology/features department, particularly, with the new film standard that is coming in the future; but I am more than happy with where it is now. I, for one, have been craving a way to take a single photo and, from that set, create multiple poseable versions of it. I think Lightroom's ability to do just that makes it superior to Photoshop. The Digital Cinema issue is a big one, but it's not something that annoys me, though fear does set in each time I need to update it. It's not unusual to hear people saying that Lightroom is the new Photoshop when it comes to photo editing. I have to admit I agree with them, but I would add that it's just the start. Lightroom may have a perma-class problem, but I don't care if I can't use it—as long as I can use Photoshop. Adobe has continued to improve the image editing, file management, and storage options, and it's nice to have around the place. The speed of Lightroom is always quick. I also think it's important to point out that, as useful as Photoshop is, it's not the answer to every problem. While the technology is great, the price tag is high.
