I spent several days testing the new features in Photoshop 2023. First off, the concept of a “One Click Delete and Fill” feature produces a welcome conservation of time. Since this is a busy artist’s segment of work, speed matters, so this saves a great deal. Unfortunately, the feature appears totally unstable. Whenever I use it, the command simply does not work. Other new features include a “Live Gaussian Blur” tool, which automatically applies a Gaussian Blur to an image based on the contrast of the content. This is a feature I greatly appreciate, because I often need assistance in making my images look clean and on-focus. I also appreciate that it appears to have a surprisingly wide dynamic range of subject brightnesses, captured in a single image. Did that really even happen? A live gradient or map tool is also new, with adorable name of “Live Gradients.” I personally think the name is better than the feature, which has some limitations (as with most of Adobe’s new features). Live Gradients can be applied to a range of things, from gradient and blur (as demonstrated in the bookmarked samples), to dialog boxes (or the tool itself), color, brightness, text, and more. Obviously, you’ll need a touchscreen to use Live Gradients, and with that, you need an iPad Pro if you want to use the feature. Live Gradients are not quite ready for real life. Your images need to be a real one-to-one match with the gradient you apply, and it is strictly limited to the currently displayed image. It also seems to rely on much of the image’s overall color content in order to produce an accurate gradient. This makes it difficult, in my opinion, to apply many of the gradients, especially those created from a color wheel, to images of color. The app does not yet allow for editing, so you cannot alter the color gradient after it has been generated. The sliders that control the gradient are also a bit clunky and strange at times.
